I had reviewed the materials for this meeting last night and had some changes to the document - not sure if it's too late and it's already gone over to the WH. In any case, let's discuss in your 1-on-1 tomorrow.

Fox News, lies, president obama, Republican Party, Rush Limbaugh

Having shed much of his dignity, core convictions and reputation for straight talk, Senator John McCain won his primary on Tuesday against the flat-earth wing of his party. Now McCain can go search for his lost character, which was last on display late in his 2008 campaign for president.

Remember the moment: a woman with matted hair and a shaky voice rose to express her doubts about Barack Obama. "I have read about him," she said, "and he's not - he's an Arab."

McCain was quick to knock down the lie. "No, ma'am," he said, "he's a decent family man, a citizen."

That ill-informed woman - her head stuffed with fabrications that could be disproved by a pre-schooler - now makes up a representative third or more of the Republican party. It's not just that 46 percent of Republicans believe the lie that Obama is a Muslim, or that 27 percent in the party doubt that the president of the United States is a citizen. But fully half of them believe falsely that the big bailout of banks and insurance companies under TARP was enacted by Obama, and not by President Bush.

Take a look at Tuesday night's box score in the baseball game between New York and Toronto. The Yankees won, 11-5. Now look at the weather summary, showing a high of 71 for New York. The score and temperature are not subject to debate.

Yet a president's birthday or whether he was even in the White House on the day TARP was passed are apparently open questions. A growing segment of the party poised to take control of Congress has bought into denial of the basic truths of Barack Obama's life. What's more, this astonishing level of willful ignorance has come about largely by design, and has been aided by a press afraid to call out the primary architects of the lies.

The Democrats may deserve to lose in November. They have been terrible at trying to explain who they stand for and the larger goal of their governance. But if they lose, it should be because their policies are unpopular or ill-conceived - not because millions of people believe a lie.

In the much-discussed Pew poll reporting the spike in ignorance, those who believe Obama to be Muslim say they got their information from the media. But no reputable news agency - that is, fact-based, one that corrects its errors quickly - has spread such inaccuracies.

Stephen Lovekin/Getty Images Rush Limbaugh So where is this "media?" Two sources, and they are – no surprise here – the usual suspects. The first, of course, is Rush Limbaugh, who claims the largest radio audience in the land among the microphone demagogues, and his word is Biblical among Republicans. A few quick examples of the Limbaugh method:

"Tomorrow is Obama's birthday – not that we've seen any proof of that," he said on Aug. 3. "They tell us Aug. 4 is the birthday; we haven't seen any proof of that."

Of course, there is proof as clear as that baseball box score. Look here, www.factcheck.org, for starters, one of many places posting Obama's Hawaiian birth certificate.

On the Muslim deception, Limbaugh has sprinkled lie dust all over the place. "Obama says he's a Christian, but where's the evidence?" he said on Aug. 19. He has repeatedly called the president "imam Obama," and said, "I'm just throwing things out there, folks, because people are questioning his Christianity."

You see how he works. He drops in suggestions, hints, notes that "people are questioning" things. The design is to make Obama un-American. Then he says it's a tweak, a provocation. He says this as a preemptive way to keep the press from calling him out. And it works; long profiles of Limbaugh have largely gone easy on him.

Once Limbaugh has planted a lie, a prominent politician can pick it up, with little nuance. So, over the weekend, Kim Lehman, one of Iowa's two Republican National Committee members, went public with doubts on Obama's Christianity. Of course, she was not condemned by party leaders.

It's curious, also, that any felon, drug addict, or recovering hedonist can loudly proclaim a sudden embrace of Jesus and be welcomed without doubt by leaders of the religious right. But a thoughtful Christian like Obama is still distrusted.

"I am a devout Christian," Obama told Christianity Today in 2008. "I believe in the redemptive death and resurrection of Jesus Christ." That's not enough, apparently, for Rev. Franklin Graham, the partisan son of the great evangelical leader, who said last week that Obama was "born a Muslim because of the religious seed passed on from his father."

Actually, he was born from two non-practicing parents, and his Kenyan father was absent for all of his upbringing. Obama came to his Christianity like millions of people, through searching and questioning.

Finally, there is Fox News, whose parent company has given $1 million to Republican causes this year but still masquerades as a legitimate source of news. Their chat and opinion programs spread innuendo daily. The founder of Politifact, another nonpartisan referee to the daily rumble, said two of the site's five most popular items on its Truth-o-meter are corrections of Glenn Beck.

Beck tosses off enough half-truths in a month to keep Politifact working overtime. Of late, he has gone after Michelle Obama, whose vacation in Spain was "just for her and approximately 40 of her friends." Limbaugh had a similar line, saying the First Lady "is taking 40 of her best friends and leasing 60 rooms at a five-star hotel – paid for by you."

The White House said Michelle Obama and her daughter Sasha were accompanied by just a few friends – and they paid their own costs. But, wink, wink, the damage is done. He's Muslim and foreign. She's living the luxe life on your dime. They don't even have to mention race. The code words do it for them.

Climate-change denial is a special category all its own. Once on the fringe, dismissal of scientific consensus is now an article of faith among leading Republicans, again taking their cue from Limbaugh and Fox.

It would be nice to dismiss the stupid things that Americans believe as harmless, the price of having such a large, messy democracy. Plenty of hate-filled partisans swore that Abraham Lincoln was a Catholic and Franklin Roosevelt was a Jew. So what if one-in-five believe the sun revolves around the earth, or aren't sure from which country the United States gained its independence?

But false belief in weapons of mass-destruction led the United States to a trillion-dollar war. And trust in rising home value as a truism as reliable as a sunrise was a major contributor to the catastrophic collapse of the economy. At its worst extreme, a culture of misinformation can produce something like Iran, which is run by a Holocaust denier.

It's one thing to forget the past, with predictable consequences, as the favorite aphorism goes. But what about those who refuse to comprehend the present?

Note: In an earlier version of this piece, a statistic for the percentage of Republicans who believe the president is Muslim was given wrong; it has been corrected.

Shaun, I did read this this morning. Of course the phrase "cluster of theaters" leaped off the page for me. I thought of you and Mitch Landrieu, who became a good friend while he was still Lt. Governor. He was the Louisiana Minister of Culture among other things. There is real hope now for N.O.

I also saw what you are doing in Memphis. There is so much to talk about it's just stupid, but we'll find a way. Of course, since "Choice Neighborhoods" is a fantastic initiative which can transform places, it is high up on the chopping block. I'm feeling the pain at my own little agency, believe me. The admin has talked a lot about inter-agency collaboration, but you and Ray have gone out and walked the walk. Housing, transportation, education, the environment, public safety, health care and quality of life (a place's aesthetic and yes, its arts) are so obviously bound together that a total collaboration is the only sensible approach. This has been your mantra from Day 1, and I don't know how or why anyone would even debate it. Approached this way, the leverage becomes exponential. I called Ray about a 26 mil proposal in St. Louis for light rail linking the Delmar arts district with Forest Park (art museum and zoo), which they granted. This will be transformative for the city. In N.O. this project will not only have big economic leverage, it will go a long way towards repairing the social fabric.

Well, I could go on and on. Better in person. Thought today's Times piece was a great validation of your vision.

Looking forward to you and Liza on the 21st indeed!

All best, Rocco

p.s: don't know if I can be of any help at all, but will be in N.O. at end of month for Jazzfest with Kathleen and Gary and Mitch too. If there's anything you'd like me to see or do, would be happy to. Rockefeller Foundation is a part of our new ArtPlace initiative (a foundation consortium to work alongside the NEA with much bigger bucks than ours) and Judy Rodin has specifically said she wants us to be very present in N.O.). The Iberville project does have an arts component, so maybe we can help.
